Whether the 190A3 was tested at 1.42 atas or not, the fact is, that it was only briefly, and this aircraft was not the only 190 to be used in comparative tests. In fact the later A4's and A5's were used more often. And they were cleared.

"At least they had provided me with an alibi by a hit in the engine, but the BMW801 continued to run smoothly even on 13 cylinders".

I don't think I would write off rough running and excessive vibration as a normal charachteristic of the engine.

Comments from soldiers, said they knew what a/c was around even if they could not seem them, for the LW a/c always sounded like they were out of tune, ie running rough.

It is all relative to what one is used to.

As you seem to have a good handle on the tested captured aircraft. Do you think that the Spit VB 1941 with Merlin 45 should be able to outclimb the standard production 190A4 from sea level to 5,000 meters?

I still have need seen anything that would support this.

I understand the LF had great low level climb.

The standard Spitfire Vb, 1941 model with a Merlin 45 or 46 should not be able to outclimb a 190A4, or even a 190A3 with its derated engine. (at least not under 25,000 ft)

I have not tested the 190A4 in this sim for this particular patch, but I have the Spitfire.

There is nothing wrong with the Spitfire Vb 1941 climb in this patch.

Whether the 190A4 is off is another question.

My understanding, and I am writing from work so don't have the tests in front of me, is that the following were the approx. max. climb rates for the 190's.

A3 (1.33 ata) 3450 fpm

A4 (1.42 ata) 3800 fpm
A5 (1.65 ata) 4250 fpm

Thanks very much Buzzsaw. I think I have a handle on the situation now.

If the 190A4 in FB is not the same as those used on the channel front, I like to know that too. That would explain everything. If that is the case I would love to see a "Channel Front" 190A4 added to FB.
